Course Description:

Ethnographic research is increasingly conducted to understand complex health problems and interventions, and this application raises new questions about what ethnography is, how it is conducted, how to address ethical questions that arise and what kinds of data are produced.

This reading group focuses on the critical reading of ethnographic research. Participants discuss methodological, epistemological and practical concerns related to doing ethnography in health and health services research.

An ethnographic research paper, book, or other material(s) will be circulated prior to each session, and as well as being attached to the meeting invite.

The reading group is open to anyone researching or interested in social studies of health, medicine and healthcare.

All meetings will be held online via Microsoft Teams. A Microsoft Teams link will be circulated along with the invite.

Reading List

Papers chosen by the attendees on ethnographic research for each session.

Eligibility

The reading group is open to anyone researching or interested in social studies of health, medicine and healthcare.
