Course Description:

Ethnographic research is increasingly conducted to understand complex health problems and interventions. This raises questions for ethnographers, funders and users of ethnographic research about what ethnography is, how it is conducted, the nature of ethnographic representations and styles (compared to other texts), how to address ethical questions that arise, and the nature of the ethnographic data that are produced.

Reading List:

This reading group offers an opportunity to consider these questions, and more, through critical reading of ethnographies related to health, including classic and contemporary ethnographies.

The reading group is open to anyone researching or interested in social studies of health, science, medicine and healthcare. Participants are expected to have read the agreed reading to participate.

Eligibility:

The reading group is open to anyone researching or interested in social studies of health, medicine and healthcare.

Pre-course preparation:

Readings will be circulated prior to each session. In order to gain access to the reading, please log into the Training Resource page on the LISS DTP website. Access to this page is available to all students who are registered with LISS DTP.

Number of students: ~20
